Dear assessor,

I run the roster at the Gray Community Growing Group, a fictional volunteer garden. I have known Callum since late 2022. We are not relatives, and I do not work for the football association or his employer. I see him on some Saturday mornings, not every week. The garden is mostly adults and this letter is not a reference from a children's service.

Callum helps with mulch, hoses and the boring end-of-day job of putting tools back where the next person can find them. We have strong opinions about water use and plot boundaries. He had a disagreement with me about a hose reel last year. He said the old one was wasting everyone's time. I thought he wanted to buy something we did not need. We left it until the next meeting and agreed to repair it first.

I have observed Callum stop an adult disagreement and return to it later without threats or throwing objects. That sentence is about the example I saw. It is not a professional assessment and I do not know how he behaves in a private relationship. He told me he had done a group program after an order with a former partner. I have not read the police account. I know enough to avoid writing that the history was simply a misunderstanding.

He is useful when a new volunteer is unsure about a tool. He explains where the stop switch is and stays nearby until they know what to do. He is not usually the most talkative person there. Sometimes he gets impatient about a plan, but he has accepted the group vote when it went the other way. We have never needed to exclude him from a working morning.

I would have him on our roster again. Whether he should have paid responsibility around junior teams is your decision and requires sources beyond our garden. I hope these ordinary observations help with the recent part of the file.
